Republicanism in Spain.

gling for a recognition of the principle of government by the people, but with a very meagre prospect of present success They have a few leaders, like Castellar, of brilliant ability and carnest purpose, and the most of them belong to the best martial classes of the warlike Spanish people. With a fair chance for organization at home, and the non-interference of any foreign power, the Republicans of Spain might win a triumph over the monarchists, and renew in the nineteenth century, the spirit that once predominated in the Iberian peninsula. But the difficulty in the way of the experiment of a Spanish republic is of a two-fold nature. The masses of the people are ignorant, and accustomed to be be very difficult for any leaders, however skilled and honest, to make these follow more comprehend that obedience to law is even more necessary in a government of the people than in a monarchy.
